At sea, en route to Málaga, Spain

From the Navigator

On departure from Valencia, Queen Anne passed into the Balearic Sea, so named for the association with the islands of Ibiza, Majorca and Minorca before heading south westerly following the Spanish Coast. This coast line has incredible links to trade routes and past occupation. Almeria was established by the Moors in 995CE, travellers who came by sea and set up numerous cities along the coast, including our previous port of Cartagena. Numerous fortresses protected the coast from further invasion, often building on Roman ruins and utilising established harbours left by the fading empire. These Spanish coastal cities became vital trade routes for spices and finery from the Middle East and Africa, routes of which are still used today by container vessels, bringing goods through Suez to the European Continent.
